Philosophers who believe sensory experiences are the ultimate determinant of knowledge are called empiricists.

TRUE

Empiricism holds that sensory experience (seeing, hearing, touching, and so on) is the source of knowledge. Empiricists assert that we experience the external world by sensory perception; then, through reflection, we conceptualize ideas that help us interpret that world.

Philosophers who believe that the innermost reality is that of mind are called idealists.

TRUE

Some philosophers assert that the physical realm is but an illusion. They point out that matter is known only through the mind. This philosophy is called spiritualism or idealism. Educators responding to ideals might focus on the relationships students have with each other or with a more spiritual world.

Teaching by the Socratic Method emphasizes answers over inquiry.

FALSE

Existentialists believe in regimentation for everyone.

FALSE

Perennialists believe an effective education need not be aimed at the transitory needs of the students or society.

TRUE

Espousing the notion that some ideas have lasted over centuries and are as relevant today as when they were first conceived, perennialism urges that these ideas should be the focus of education. According to perennialist, when students are immersed in those profound and enduring ideas, they will appreciate learning for its own sake and will become true intellectuals.

Behaviorists believe each person has the free-will to develop as he or she sees fit.

FALSE

Behaviorism urges teachers to use a system of reinforcement to encourage desired behaviors, to connect learning with pleasure and reward. According to B.F. Skinner, behaviorism can enable students to learn material even if they do not fully understand why it will have value in their futures. Existentialists, on the other hand, believe each person has the free will to develop as he or she sees fit.

Essentialists support a rigidly structured curriculum.

TRUE

Essentialism is the traditional, or back-to-basics, approach to education that strives to instill students with the "essentials" of academic knowledge and character development. In essentialist programs, teachers or administrators decide what is most important for the students to learn and place little emphasis on student interests, particularly when such interests divert time and attention from the academic curriculum.

Perennialists believe emphasis on rote memory is the key method of teaching students.

FALSE

Perennialism focuses on the universal truths that have withstood the test of time. Perennialists urge that students read the Great Books and develop their understanding of philosophical concepts that underlie human knowledge. Perennialism strives above all to develop our capacity to reason, and it regards training in the humanities as central to the development of our rational powers.
